

PLACE MAGAZINE REPORT 2009

PLACE continues to grow as a recognized section within the monthly edition of the Adelaide Review, providing a public platform for the 4 Institutes of Landscape Architecture, Architecture, Planning and Design to celebrate the achievements of their members and increasingly this year provide an opportunity to express their views on issues relevant to the State.

We would like to thank the growing list of contributors in the last year, who have helped promote the values and abilities of the profession through their articles and opinions. In the last 12 months we have covered specific landscape architecture projects, such as the Panada's and Johnny McIntyre's student award, provided coverage of the National Conference and addressed issues relevant to landscape architecture and the state, include street trees, heat islands and more recently a collective critique of the 30year plan for South Australia. The September edition provides an introduction into the upcoming State Awards, with more coverage planned towards the end of the year.

Earlier this year Amanda Ward became the new editor for PLACE and the Adelaide Review, and she has proven to be an excellent resource in covering these issues, and takes away much of the 'journalistic pressure' that may be associated with contributing to PLACE.

We continue to welcome new ideas, contacts, projects and articles for each monthly edition as well as feedback. The editorial committee meets early in each month, with deadlines in the final week.

Additionally, sponsorship and advertising in PLACE is an important issue. We would appreciate any leads that our members may have to potential advertisers to ensure the ongoing development of PLACE.

Please contact Ben Willsmore at Oxigen, should you wish to contribute. The National website also provides an archive of the monthly PLACE editions.
